Teacher's Notes

'Did you..?' Queue

It is often difficult to get learners to change partner. Queues are a simple and relatively fast way to assign partners for a pair work activity, and also give practice in question forms. The outcome can be random if cards are distributed randomly or can be 'fixed', often useful for ensuring separation of learners with shared mother tongues.

1. Make two copies of the cards sheet.
2. Cut one copy up into cards. Keep the other as a reference. There are 18 cards on the sheet. If your class is smaller use the reference sheet to make sure you give out the first 12, 14, etc. To 'fix' the queue write learners' names on the back of the card you want them to have and then mix up the cards.
3. (Optional) Whole class brainstorm on what they did last night.
4. Tell the class they are going to ask each other about what they did last night. Give them out one card each at random or fixed by you and tell them to reassemble the queue by asking other learners "What did you do last night?" or "Did you?". When they find the person behind and in front of them, they should stand in line.
5. When the queue has formed tell learners that they are working in pairs and their partner is the person beside them in the queue or that the queue is the order in which they are to sit..
6. (Optional) Each learner speaks for at least a minute on the activity described in the card they have. It may be a good idea to fix the queue so shy learners get the more outrageous cards (shooting the neighbours' cat..) as telling a fictitious story often encourages these learners to talk more freely.
